Most people wait for a spark — a moment of clarity, energy, or inspiration. But motivation isn't a rare burst of lightning; it's a habit you build through action.

When you act consistently, regardless of how you feel, you train your brain to move forward on command. Small actions compound. Discipline creates momentum. And eventually, you no longer need a reason to begin — you just begin.

True motivation doesn't come before action. It comes from it.
